

Message Never Delivered.

Up at Port Nelson, on the Hudson Bay, there is a German reservist who is still awaiting a call to war. His name government officials would not disclose, but they stated that prior to the outbreak of war he sent a wireless message from Le Pas to the German consul, asking whether he should report for duty. This message has, of course, never been delivered, and up at Port Nelson its sender is still awaiting his reply, meanwhile spending his energies in the wielding of a pick and shovel in the interests of the Canadian government.
