

GERMAN WAS NOT WELCOMED.

Visitor to Kingston Did Not Like Treatment.

Watertown, N.Y., Times.

That war is just what Sherman said it was is the opinion of a German who passed through this city Wednesday bound for his home in New York after an unpleasant attempt to enjoy his summer vacation in Kingston, Ont.

The German is an old friend of Edward Kaiser, of this city, and comes for a brief visit to Watertown each year on his way to Canada. He got here Saturday afternoon and stopped off between trains.

"You can't get into Canada without passports; you'll get pinched," Mr. Kaiser told him, but the local progressive did not succeed in "kidding" his friend from Heidelberg, for Mr. Kaiser was joking, but conditions were more serious than he knew, as the visitor learned.

Saturday night the German continued his invasion. He was met at the wharf in Kingston by immigration officials and others who looked upon his unmistakable Teutonic countenance with expressions of disfavor. He was permitted to land, however, but thereafter, he says, the Kingstonians proceeded to make his stay so unpleasant that the visitor soon left.

He said that officials trailed him about wherever he went. Officers of various departments stopped him every little while, inquired his business and looked into his acts. He decided to escape from the torrid temperature of the early week by a swim in the lake and after he was in the water he looked up to see a policeman sitting on the bank watchfully waiting. It made the German wonder if he would be permitted to come ashore, but he was, and after dressing wandered back to the city, with the constable a respectful distance in the rear like a well-trained orderly.

Tuesday night, the German became so tired of life in Kingston that he started for New York, not even pausing long enough to stop off in this city.
