

CAUSED A SENSATION

Soldiers March Well-Dressed Prisoners Through Streets.

After an interview, which extended over an hour, two soldiers from the Stanley Barracks took another civilian in charge this afternoon. Inspector Kennedy refused to give the man's name, but from his appearance and manner of dress, the prisoner is apparently a person of some consequence. When the soldiers came from Inspector Kennedy's office with their rifles over their shoulders, the prisoner sauntered nonchalantly along between them. Wearing an expensive overcoat and a neat business suit, and with his ankles encased in grey spats, he paid absolutely no attention to the group of idlers who stared at him. As the little procession left the City Hall—the soldiers with fixed bayonets—the man in custody lighted a cigar and smiled pleasantly toward a group of men standing on the steps of the City Hall.

"It is a military matter and I cannot give you the man's name," said Inspector Kennedy.

At the Registration Office for Aliens, The Star was told that no person had been ~~interned~~ to-day.

He was believed to be Arthur Zirzow, a lieutenant in the German army, who has been a prisoner at Stanley Barracks. He was mentioned in connection with the Nerlich case, and may have been brought downtown for an interview with the officials.
