

LETTER SENT TO FORT

But It Really Belonged to a Kingston Lad.

A young lad named Karl Leishman, employed in one of the local hardware stores, had an amusing experience on Tuesday night when he went home to find a letter waiting for him. Upon looking at the letter he discovered that the postal authorities evidently thinking that he was a prisoner-of-war in Fort Henry, had sent the letter to the fort. The authorities at the fort, after reading the letter found that there was no such man in captivity, so returned it to the local post office. The letter later found the right party. The person who sent the letter to Kingston did not put any street address upon it.
