"It must be in him when he is sober to come out of him when he is drunk," was the opinion expressed by Staff-Sergeant McKinney in the early court when John Zack, a naturalized Austrian, faced a charge of having uttered anti-British statements. The excuse forwarded by Mr. T. O'Connor, the man's lawyer, was that his client was drunk, which brought forth the expression by the sergeant.

As for Magistrate Cohen, he commented, with Solomonic wisdom, "that a man is what he is."

According to the evidence of the police Zack keeps a store on Bathurst street and last night became intoxicated and started to applaud the efforts of Germany and Austria, occasionally reviling Great Britain. In the course of his drunken jaunt he stumbled into Union Station and entering the ladies' waiting room made himself a general nuisance. He was finally arrested.

Mr. O'Connor exhibited certificates of good character written by friends of the accused, but they appeared to make little difference to his Worship, who imposed a fine of $20 and costs or 30 days.
