

THE ARNPRIOR GERMANS.

Chronicle: During the past week The Chronicle had a visit from a McNab German farmer; his parents were born in the old land, they lived there until they were grown up, and he is strongly German in his ways, his mannerisms and his accent—but not in his principles or his hopes. He puts the Kaiser in his right place, he remembers the grinding process among the common folk, as told by his father; he does not forget the intrigue, the injustice and the murders of the Kaiser and his people before and during the war; he realizes and appreciates the broad freedom of Canada under British rule, where every man, if he be an honest man, is entitled to a full share of this young nation's goods and advantages, he remembers that his parents left a despot and despotism to live happily under free, democratic government and if he must give, and maybe fight, he will be 'neath the folds of the old Union Jack that has been so much to him and his. Such are the sentiments of the average Canadian German herabout.
