

Gabriel Haas, a local youth with an angelic name, enlisted last week and went to London to train for the front. As Gabriel was under age, he had to get his father, Mr. Alex Haas, who is a native of Germany, to sign his release papers for him, and if anybody ever doubted Alex's loyalty to the British cause, their suspicions would have been promptly given the quietus could they have seen the proud father with tear-bedimmed eyes signing the paper that gave his youngest and the only son he had at home to the cause of the Allies. Many British fathers in this town who may be seen daily standing around the bulletin board unreeling a lot of loyalty talk, would look better following Alex Haas' stunt by signing papers for their sons and getting them off to the front instead of having them lurking around home while the Empire is in danger, and the forces of freedom are strenuously holding on the thin red line against the greatest military tyrant the world has ever known. We know homes in this town where there are several able-bodied sons, and yet the Empire has not seen the name of one of them yet on a service roll, and this at a time when the flag is in danger and our very national existence is threatened. In thousands many of the highest born are following Britain's example of laying off all their unmarried employes who won't enlist for the war, and while we wouldn't recommend such a step yet in Walkerton, still we think some homes in this town should be mortally ashamed of their pusillanimous conduct in this war.—Herald and Times.
