MENACED BY DELUSIONS
The Globe (1844-1936); Apr 13, 1917; ProQuest Historical Newspapers: The Globe and Mail

trong and natural antagonisms, warped by a desed to lure the British people into adopting pro-The truth that protection is rasped by the blade has been demonstrated again nd again by British thinkers, but there may be a anger that war will cloud public judgment. lelusion that foreigners can be made to pay a ation's taxation is sufficiently strong to play а It is of course impossible to tax the ninor part. oreigner, but it is quite possible to enable the oregner to make levies. It may or may not be weeter to give than to get, but it is undoubtedly asier, as anyone who has attempted both can tes-A people shut off by their high tariff from favorable source of supply can be levied on by ther foreigners favored by a preference. A A British preference for Canadian grain, for ex-imple, would enable Canadians, if other British ources were shut off, to levy protection on Britsh consumers. In Canada we have little to fear lirectly from these agitations. We are not likely o make our tariff much worse than it is. Britain is menaced by a planned political and conomic blunder that would make the prolonging of her economic supremacy impossible. The roice of understanding should be raised before he menacing delusions obtain a dangerous hold.

MENACED BY DELUSIONS. Premature plans to be adopted by Britain after Premature plans to be adopted by Britain after the war give frequent reminders that protectionists are among those seeking to use the war to further their fads and projects. If they can once get Britain limed with the adhesive mess and entangled in the intricate net, they think her extrication will be impossible. That freedom from the burdens of protection has enabled Britain to finance the world war for all the Allies is a momentous and convincing truth they complacently ignore. The irrefutable logic of the situation they reject. Apart from the misuse of military terms in discussing trade, a common trick that has almost lost its effectiveness, the chief strength of the protectionists lies in the delusion that a nation can injure another without injuring herself. This has been made the basis for an elaborate system of varied tariffs, to be applied to similar products from different countries. Evidently not plummet has yet sounded the depths of human stupidity in tariff impositions. Buyers of goods originating in the countries with which Britain is now at war are to be taxed, according to these proposals, more heavily than buyers of similar goods from other countries. Of course this is impossible. Similar goods when they reach the consumer will command similar prices. There is are also to be tariffs, varied as goods come by a train, boat, or airplane, and the fact that they come by a short cut through another nation will also produce varying levice.

The delusion that Britain can injure foreign of nations without inflicting greater injury on her ne self sustains the notion that she can punish then by taxing her people when buying their goods